

If a population is undergoing directional selection, can it be at genetic equilibrium?

A yes

B no

C maybe

For a population to be at genetic equilibrium, there must be no selection— all members of the population must survive and mate at random.

Answer B.

Starr C'16'18 2002-10-23