

Arrowhead plants (Sagittaria sagittifolia) can have very different forms, depending on whether they grow on land or in water. Why are they still considered to be the same species?

A They can interbreed.

B They compete with one another.

C They have the same nutritional requirements.

Regardless of their appearance, if under natural conditions, individuals can interbreed and produce viable offspring, they are considered members of the same species.

Answer A.

Starr C'17'10 2002-10-23